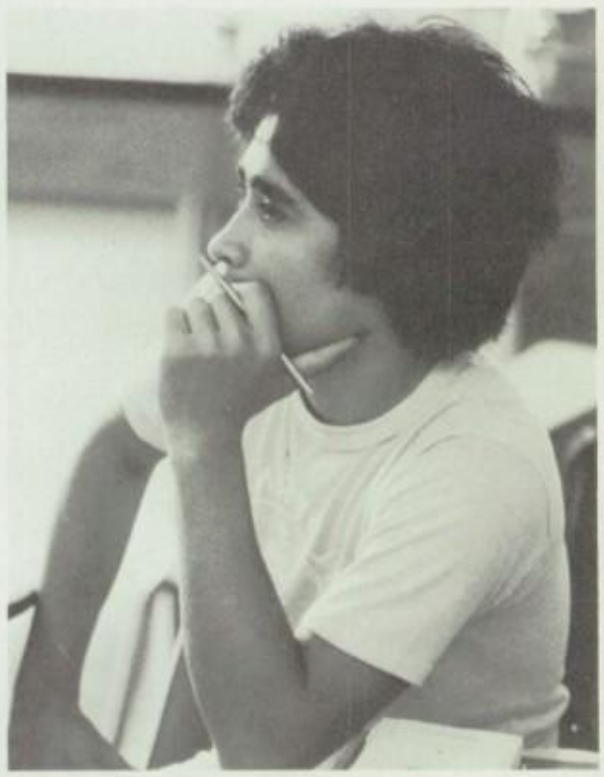
CHEER



From the beginning of that first school day in September 1980 on, we were faced with challenges — challenges in every possible aspect of the word. Which titles would we capture in Sports? How many Merit Scholars would spring from T.Z.? How could we prevent a budget cut? The list goes on and on and on.

Each day became a new challenge — a day to conquer and climb to higher success and accomplishment. We were ready to face every one of these challenges with eagerness and excitement, although the road was long and winding, because we knew we had the power — the power to make things work — make them work for us and for everyone around us.

All our accomplishments will stay with T.Z. forever because WE DIDN'T JUST TRY . . . WE DID!

The class of 1981 proudly dedicates this yearbook to a lady who has shown courage and loyalty to both T.Z., as a whole and all of its students. Miss Ann Singer has been unanimously voted as this year's "dedicatee" because of all the love and effort she has put, not only into the "Halfmoon", but into the Fall play, the Spring musical and "Tapress." Even under the most stressful conditions, Ann Singer never lost her drive or determination to do the very best job she could — in EVERYTHING she did.

So we commend you for a job well done, with all our love and sincerest thanks. Thank you Ann Singer for making our High school years so much more memorable and easier because of all your help, caring and talent.

Thanks,

The Class of '81

STUDENT LIFE

1981 1981 1981

RING NIGHT 1980

Curiosity, anticipation and excitement filled the cafeteria as the Jostens' "ringman" arrived. Finally, Juniors would get their long-awaited school rings.

Ring Night has long been a tradition at T.Z. and was a great success this year. The Junior Class advisor, Mr. Van Houten and the Ring Committee spent a lot of time organizing the event and their efforts paid off.

The cafeteria was brightly decorated with red and white streamers, which soon found their way wrapped around some enthusiastic students. Music, provided by Eclipse, filled the room and kept everybody moving and tapping to the beat. Food was plentiful and everyone had an enjoyable evening.

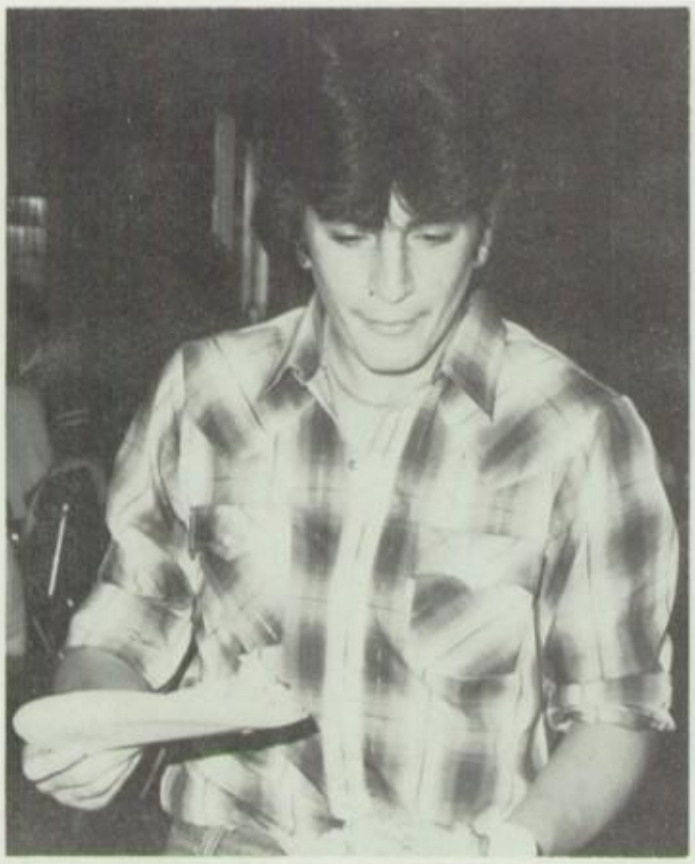
But perhaps the most memorable part of Ring Night, was the mobs of Juniors trying to get 83 other people to turn those precious rings.

School rings — ornamental, yet they are symbolic and special to each one of us in a different way.

Because of the huge variety of food, Susan Alessio ('82), chooses her meal very carefully.

Elated by the new rings, junior Ellen Platton and Anne Buchan express their joy.

Junior Class Officers Craig Lively and Kai Elken host the activities of the evening.



One plate isn't big enough to serve junior Dennis Decicco's needs.

Although the year ends, our school rings serve forever to remind us of our High School days.

Dee Johnson ('82) just relaxes and has a good time.

Juniors Pat Lynch, Tom Irizarri and Joe Leonardo eagerly wait for their class rings.

Juniors Mae Clemente and Gale Henry have fun exercising the tradition of ring turning.

Although everyone else is digging in, Junior Gail Horton does not seem too eager to fill her plate.

"Do it up!" "I'm cuttin' out!" "Gimme a drag." "Gotta butt?" "Got snagged . . . 1 week detention!" "Excellent man, a sub!" "What!? A test TODAY . . . I'm bumming."

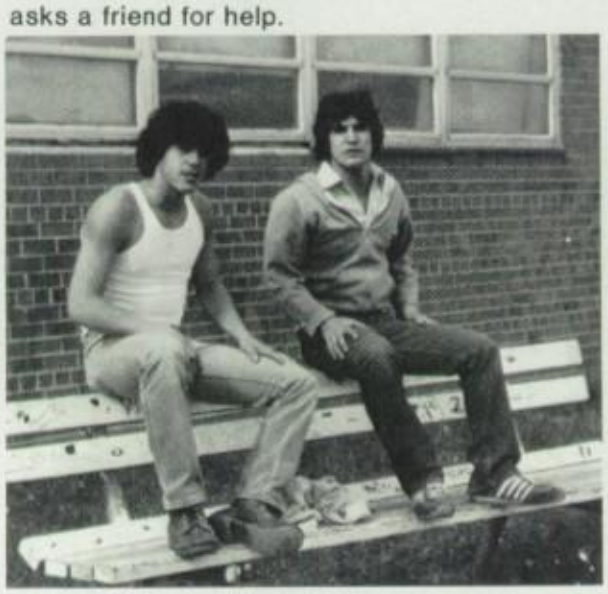
Sound familiar? Whether you cut out, hung out, did both or neither, these were some of the most popular expressions used by students.

Our hangouts included such places as the courtyards, parking lots, the end of the 200's hall, Waldbaums', the cafeteria and just about any place that teachers did not or would not go to.

Why hang out or cut out? "Well," quoted one senior, "Some days I Just needed the rest." Some students felt they deserved a few cuts, others thought of it as a challenge and then there were those who really didn't know why they did it.

Well, whatever the reason and wherever you may have roamed, hanging out and cutting did require some skill. Besides, like everything else done in T.Z., didn't practice make perfect?!

A Typical action-packed period of study hall. Tom Pulzone '81 seemingly a little confused, asks a friend for help.



Seniors Mike Demaio and Dean Dellolio find the rear parking lot a good place to hang out.

Before, during and after the lunch periods, students hang out in the cafeteria.

Lunchtime is a good time for friends to get together in the courtyard and chat.

Susan Alessio and Brenda Hogan ('82) munch out at Waldbaums'.

Senior Paul Alpuche and Janet Capone ('83) find time for love in the courtyard.

Seniors Damon Torres and John Hudson come down to earth.

Sophs. Tom Wisnewski and Gene Lucena discover new and unnameable things in the cafeteria food.

Burger King is a common hangout after every football game.

Senior Shari Weiser secretly informs Bernie Dennehey ('81) that her shoelaces are untied.

Juniors Karen Flanagan, Margaret Foley find other things to do during their free time.

Dominic Lamandri ('82), Fred Piesco ('82) and Hugh Artrip ('82) search for a place to get away

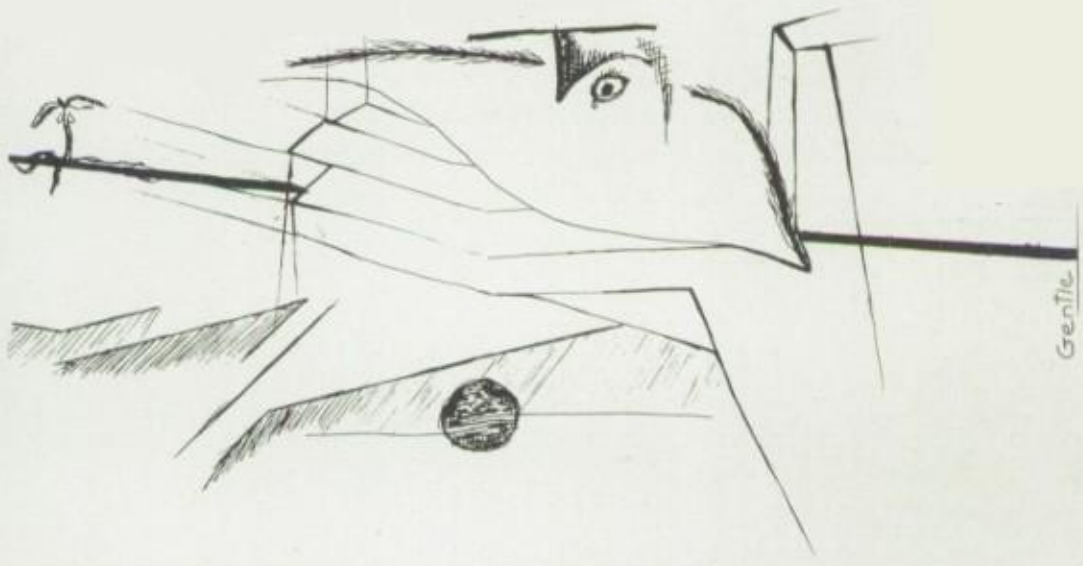
After four years you get to know us pretty well

BEST OF LUCK TO THE CLASS OF 1981



Gentle

WALL

The hurdles of challenges we faced all through the year became mountains of achievement and success. — Our girls Soccer Team captured the County title, an honour never before reached by our team. Individual T.Z. Track members burst forth with new County records. Our boys' Basketball Team members also reached new goals and records. The Flag of Excellence proudly flies outside, exemplifying academic excellence. The budget was safe for one more year — and the list could go on forever.

These are all the products of an eagerness to win, a desire to be number one. We left marks on T.Z. that can never be taken away — all the work, sweat and effort that went into these accomplishments will also never fade.

Leaving T.Z., we also take a part of it with us the memories — memories of friends, memories of the good times, even memories of the not-so-good times, and all other memories because we made our high school years the best they could be — we didn't just try — each one of us gave all we had, so we made it work. Now we have the memories which will last forever.

The year is 1991. It is a cold, rainy night and the children have finally been put to bed. For lack of something better to do, you take your old Halfmoon from the top of a shelf. You turn the pages, marvelling at the silly way the girls wore their hair and wonder what ever happened to that sweet kid in your English class. — You are transported back to the year 1980-1981.

It was the year the girls wore boots in the sun and high open-toe Candies in the rain.
It was the year they dyed their hair exotic colors to look "punk."
It was the year everyone wore dark sunglasses — indoors.
It was the year high school kids wanted to be "preppy."
It was the year the Music Hall was dazzled by Fame.
It was the year our choir took Disney World by storm.
It was the year everyone loved the "Boss."
It was the year all Rocky Horror fans were doing the "Time Warp."
It was the year we threw darts at the Ayahtollah. (among other things!)
It was the year the actors went on strike and left us with three months of reruns.
It was the year we were looking for actors on television but instead, elected one into the White House. (As if there weren't enough comedians in Washington.)
It was the year John Bonham of the Led Zeppelin died.
It was the year we all mourned the brutal death of John Lennon.
It was the year our hostages were finally brought home after 444 days of captivity.
It was the year . . . time has slipped by faster than you realized. You drift off to sleep, the Halfmoon in your lap and you dream of your unforgotten days at T.Z.

The Seasons

She was the most beautiful mortal baby ever to be born. She had the fairest and most precious skin and hair ever given to a human. She was an absolute wonderous creature to behold. It was fate that this jewel had been born to Atherus and Patorea.

Atherus and Patorea were a very loving, generous but poor mortal couple who lived in a small secluded area about thirty miles from Olympus. All the gods loved and favored the couple because they were so warm and generous to all those who came to visit them.

Their baby was also very happy and loving. She filled the hearts of all those who looked upon her with joy. Thus, she was named Summarius, after Summeri, the god of love.

Everyday from her day of birth was a warm, green, and beautiful one. This was due to the love that Summarius so greatly projected. She loved everybody and everything. Everyone loved her too. All except one woman by the name of Thorea.

Thorea despised Atherus and Patorea for having a child. She herself could not, for she was so ugly that no man would have her. Thus she could not bear children. This jealousy and resentment drove her to the point that she was determined to dispose of the child.

One night while Summarius was fast asleep, Thorea crept into her room and strangled the poor defenseless child to death.

The next morning Patorea awoke only to find his child dead in her crib. He then woke Atherus, who was still fast asleep. How could their precious daughter be dead? It was not fair. They did not know it was Thorea who murdered the child.

The gods felt sad and sorry for the couple. They could not punish Thorea, for it was not the god's place to interfere with mortal affairs. Instead they named a part of the year in Summerius' honor. It was call summer. It would be a time in which all things would be green, warm and beautiful.

Years later, after some of the grief and sadness waned, Atherus bore again. This time she had a set of twins. One of which was a boy, the other being a girl. They were beautiful, but not half as beautiful as Summerius, nor could they project the same amount of love as Summerius had done.

Atherus blamed this on the grief, fury, and sadness which plagued her for so long.

The girl was named Springus. She was named after the god of kindness, Springalian. The boy was named Fallus. He was named after the god of the sun, Falliga.

When Thorea heard of the twins, she once again became destined to destroy them. One day while the two were playing outside an old woman came up to them and offered each a cookie. This old woman was actually Thorea in disguise. Springus kindly refused the gift. Fallus impetuously grabbed the cookie and ate it. Springus then realized the woman was hurt by her refusal and shyly took the cookie. After they were done eating the old woman left.

After she was gone, the two children suddenly fell and became ill with pain. Apparently the cookies had been poisoned.

Later, when Atherus came out to hang some laundry, she found her two children dead on the ground. Once again death faced her. She called Patorea out to see the destiny that had become of their children. The couple were absolutely heartbroken and ready to die themselves.

Again the gods mourned with Atherus and Patorea. Two more times of the year were named in their honor. Spring was named for Springus. It would be a time when beautiful flowers and plants bloomed. Fall was named for Fallus. It was to be when the leaves on all the trees turned magnificent colors, and the sky would become a gorgeous blue.

Atherus and Patorea could not handle all this grief and such great loss, so each plunged a dagger into the heart of the other. Now they would be with their children once again.

It was then that the gods decided it was time to punish Thorea. The sky became dark and cloudy, violent storms knocked down trees and houses. It became so cold that the lakes and all water froze. These forces were sent to destroy Thorea. They did. After the storm waned, she was found frozen in a block of ice. It was the nemesis she deserved.

Then the gods named yet another part of the year, winter. The name was given to this part in honor of Atherus and Patorea. It was derived from the god of death, Winteral. It was to be a time of cold weather and blizzards to remind all of the sad way in which such a loving couple died for the love of their murdered children, for which each season of the year is named.

Tide

Many a summer day, a beautiful maiden named Tide walked to the beach with her friends. Her father Bechulus was the god of the earth's beaches and shorelines. For hours each day Tide and her friends combed the beach for seashells and made friends with the seagulls and the brightly colored minnows who lovingly bit their toes when the girls placed them into the enveloping foam of the splashing waves.

Upon one of these lovely days, she and her friends decided to look for periwinkles. Poseiden, the sea god, noticed how beautiful Tide was and he was determined to make her his queen. He pulled back the waters a tiny bit to reveal a lovely yellow shell glimmering in the afternoon sun. Tide quickly ran to snatch it from its watery abode and placed it into a fold of her dress. When she started to return to her friends, Poseiden pulled the waters far out to sea to reveal the most dazzling purple periwinkle bedecked with a brilliant streak of gold circling its middle. Tide could not resist the temptation of it, although she knew she was far from shore and her friends. She decided to take it and give it as a present to her father. She tied her skirts higher and made a dash in the direction of the shell. She ran so quickly that even the wind could not follow her. As she grew nearer and nearer, the shell seemed to increase in its size and lustre. But, as she tried to grasp it, she could not move it. She pulled with all her might, but it would not budge. Her friends were calling to her to come back because a great surge of water was going to cover her. Their cries were in vain, for Tide was more interested in the shell rather than her friends' pleas. The wall of water drew closer and closer as she tried to uproot the shell from its bed of sand. The water covered her in one gigantic swell. Poseiden then came to her rescue on his chariot pulled by two sturdy, very large, and brilliantly colored seahorses. He took her down, deeper and deeper, into his strangely, mysterious, watery kingdom beneath the dancing waves.

When Bechulus returned from his duties as an immortal, he could not find his beloved daughter. He combed the beaches of the world looking for her. He asked the seagrass if they had seen her, but all they could do was to wave side to side, repeating a successive no. Bechulus inquired of a lone seagull searching for its dinner, but the seagull said she had not seen Tide but she would scan the horizon for her.

Bechulus, weary from his long journey, sat down on a large boulder watching the many colored fish dart to and fro among the tall seaweed. He called the fish together and asked, in desperation if anyone of them had seen his daughter. One small goldfish replied that he had seen Poseiden abduct her and take her down into the depths of his realm. Bechulus thanked the fish and went to find Poseiden, the feared god of the deep.

Bechulus was soon granted an audience with the god. Poseiden felt compassion for him, but he also desired to keep his beautiful queen for himself alone. The god of the deep finally decided to let Tide return to her father and friends two times out of a day because she had taken two prized shells from the domain of sea.

From then on, the water recedes from the land to let Tide return to her father and when the water meets the land again, Tide must go to her husband, Poseiden, and return to her duties as the queen of the sea.

Alone
No one else
The penetrating heat
With no water
They cast me out
I am different
They cast me out
Because I'll be me
They tried to change me
But I'll be me
Let the sand blow
Let the heat pour
Let them cast me out
But I'll be me.

The Demon

The night was hot with the smell of the dead;
We saw a demon, his eyes
glimmering red.
He lived in a land that was once nicknamed hell;
We all felt a tremble and started to yell.
He said, "Don't you worry,
I will not hurt you now,
but you will slave for me as long as time will allow."
He took us under the earth to a place never heard of,
All we could see were the rocks and dirt far above.
I grabbed his pitchfork,
stabbing deep in his heart,
Smiling he took out a map,
which looked more like a chart.
It showed the passage way out of this hole,
He then disintegrated into coal.
We started our journey out of this hell,
burning fear in our hearts
we started to yell.
At the end of the tunnel, suddenly viewing a light,
We grew so happy we forgot
all our fright.
We left this place, that we despised so much,
We were lucky that we had escaped his clutch.
We got back to our town,
there was no one around -

The Demon returned again....?

The Obstacle

None of us ever imagined such an innocent prank would result in the flashing squad cars rushing to the scene of the accident. To understand what really happened, let me begin from the very beginning....

It was a warm July night, and everything was quiet and calm. The sky was clear from any clouds, and millions of tiny stars were out. There seemed to be something weird about it, but I couldn't figure it out. All of the kids who usually hang out on the block were at a Yankee game in the city. Linda, Jay and I were the only ones around at the time.

As we sat on the corner of our street, we tried to think of something to do.

"I got it" said Jay excitedly "let's go downtown to the carnival"!

I answered him quickly, "Yeah right, and how are we gonna get down there?"

"Oh, I forgot about getting a ride." He really sounded disappointed, but there was nothing I could do about it because I wasn't going to walk a mile just to go to some dumb carnival. As I looked over at Linda to see if she had thought of anything, in the corner of my eye, I caught the sight of the neighbor's junk pile, and in it a lot of old furniture.

"Hey, look at the Jones' house. They're finally throwing away some of that old furniture". Jay and Linda both turned and looked in that direction. Linda, after staring for a minute, said "I got the greatest thing to do! It's a little risky, but I know we can pull it off".

"Well, if it's so great, let's hear it", said Jay.

"Okay, first we get a piece of that old furniture. Then, we put it in the middle of the highway, and we'll see what the cars do".

"God," said Jay. "When you said it was risky, you really meant it".

In my mind, I knew that it could lead to someone getting hurt, but my eagerness to follow the crowd was there more than my eagerness to listen to my own common sense, anyway. I figured it would be a one in a million chance for anything to happen to us, so, I agreed with her, and we started to plan it out.

After a while, our little dare began. Jay ran up to the pile of junk and grabbed anything he could find. He came back with an old high chair. We ran up the road, ducking trying to avoid oncoming cars, as we approached the highway. When we reached the highway, I grabbed the high chair from Jay and stood it up in the middle of the right side of the road.

"I think this is crazy," I said shakily.

"Well, would you rather be sitting in the corner twiddling your thumbs?" said Linda rather sharply.

"I guess not, even though we could be doing something less dangerous."

Out of nowhere Jay said, "Well, there's no backing out now because there's a car coming."

The only thing that came to my mind was to run, and not to stop until the car is gone. All three of us scrambled into the woods which were right across from the highway, and waited for the car to get there.

I thought the driver of the car would have some common sense and stop, but I realized he wasn't going to. Maybe the driver wasn't paying attention.

"Holy God, he's gonna hit it", were my last words before all three of us heard an explosive sound, and then smack.

None of us turned around to see what had happened, but we all ran like crazy through the woods until we came to an opening which was a road. My heart was beating faster than it ever did before. I think Jay's and Linda's hearts were doing the same.

"I don't believe it", said Jay tiredly. "We could have just killed somebody".

"Well", said Linda "Let's go around the block, and make-believe we were just going for a walk, and came upon the accident. This way, we can find out who is hurt, and who was not".

As we started walking around the block, my mind went into a daze. I really couldn't believe what had just happened. I just hoped nobody was hurt or especially killed.

We walked around the corner, and flashing red lights were at the scene. I realized that after the car hit the high chair, it must have lost control, and smashed into the telephone pole. The whole front end was smashed. I prayed at that moment nobody was killed.

"Hey Jay", I said "go over to the cop, and ask him what happened".

"Okay" said Jay. He approached the cop, and then he said:

"Excuse me, could you tell me what happened"?

"Yeah", said the cop, "Someone put an obstacle in the middle of the road, and the car hit it, which made it lose control. After losing control, it smashed into the pole".

"Yeah, pretty bad too! The ambulance is on the way".

"Okay thanks". Jay turned from the cop, and then walked over to us and said "there are ambulances coming, and someone's badly hurt".

"Oh my God" said Linda. "We should never have done it. It was probably the dumbest thing we've ever done before"!

The ambulance arrived, and the paramedics began their treatment on the two people who were in the car. After about fifteen minutes, one of them was pronounced dead. The three of us almost fainted. It was hard to believe we killed someone. The other victim was in critical condition, and was being rushed to the hospital. A tow truck arrived and towed the wrecked car away. Little by little the scene cleared. The three of us walked down our block with so much guilt that we felt like killing each other. We said goodnight to each other, and as I walked down my driveway, I looked up at the sky. It was clear from any clouds and there were millions of tiny stars. It was very quiet and calm. There was something weird about it, but I really couldn't figure it out. Tears came down my cheeks, and I went in and cried for the rest of the night.

The accident's cause was never repeated to anyone else. We decided the best thing to do was to keep it to ourselves, and we did. Nobody knew who put the obstacle there, and never will!

"Embalmer's Woes"

Arthur Hastings had no dislike of his work - as many other people did. He did not love it, either, but he did not hate it. It was a job like any other person's job - and someday maybe others would realize that.

Sometimes, people - knowing he was the local mortician - would ask him how he could stand living over all those dead bodies, some awaiting embalmment, others already embalmed nestled securely in coffins between clean silk sheets. Arthur always said that all you have to do is realize that these people are dead and do not walk about the corridors in chains; then you would have no problems. In other words, it helped to have a total lack of imagination.

And Arthur never had a bit of trouble with his job - until the foggy night he embalmed one John Morton.

The services for the dead had been performed in the afternoon - in what the mortician humorously called the "waiting rooms." No wakes would be held that evening, and for the rest of the day he could expect to be undisturbed. For obvious reasons, a mortician had few friends and he was free from their possible interruptions.

At first, everything was well. This Morton's blood was drained out and was replaced by icy cool embalming fluid. Fine. John Morton now had a pleasant, pale complexion. The mortician closed his eyes, stretched and yawned loudly.

Someone sneezed. Arthur said, "God bless you," automatically and then stopped. Who did that? Had some perverse grave robber broken in? He went to the door and looked down both sides of the dimly lit hall. Nothing.

Maybe whoever it was was upstairs thought the anxious mortician. He was about to check when he saw that John Morton, who until recently had had blood instead of embalming fluid in his vains, was sitting up. Absurdly, his first thought was that John Morton had retained his good posture even in death.

Only a portion of the thought was spoken. "You're dead!" came past his lips and nothing more.

"Yes," said young Mr. Morton pleasantly with a laugh, "I am. I guesss you could say I'm UNDEAD, like the vampires." He smiled again. "But don't worry; I don't drink blood like these demons."

In fact, young Mr. Morton was very pleasant. If he hadn't been dead, Arthur thought, they might have been friends. He gradually began to relax until Mr. Morton mentioned something about company coming. The mortician stiffened immediately. Up until now he hadn't fully realized it; this man was dead! What was going on?

Arthur ran out the door, but turned the wrong way in the darkness of the hall. Instead of getting out of the house, he ended up in the refrigerated room where he stored the bodies of those awaiting embalmment.

From every single steel cabinet came a loud knocking. The occupants wanted out.

When John Morton walked into the noisy chamber, he noticed that his friend, the mortician, was curled up in the far corner. Just as well, he thought. And then he released the people clamoring against their steel prisons.

All the mortician thought of while this was going on was that his house - the funeral parlor - was frightening to him now. There were oh, so many shadows, unlit, silent corridors. He was the only one who was living in this house. All the other inhabitants were dead.

Slowly, a host of white, pallid faces arranged themselves around him. Between the walls and the dead, he was surrounded.

One of them left the group and was replaced in line by another. Arthur Hastings raised his head and looked openly at them.

They were grim visages. Their rouge-colored lips were set firm and their opaque foreheads were creased, as if by intense concentration. And they were all looking at him.

Somehow, the fog had crept into the house. Its dank smell forced the mortician to full consciousness and he was completely aware of his surroundings when they passed judgment on him.

John Morton apparently was their spokesman. He told Arthur Hastings what it was like to be dead. Of the terror of the ending of all you've known. The realization that all of your world, your past, your hopes, a million other things are ending and you know it is coming in the last split second. And sometimes you go beyond that and you feel the ice creep in your veins, numbing your brain... and at the end, you are sealed in a coffin where you realize you will spend eternity. Eternity in a grim box - closed in under tons of dirt. But you need not worry about dying. That's only a small taste of death.

"You will know it all soon enough," continued John Morton, pneumonia victim. "All the bitterness of it. You are outcast from living beings. But a few minutes before, you and I had a pleasant conversation. Yes, you talked with me. A simple friendly conversation with a dead man, a pleasure you rarely enjoy with a live one. So you see how you're really one of us. You're partly dead already."

Arthur Hastings tried, one last time, to save himself. Taking them by surprise, he burst through the ranks of the dead, but tripped over his own feet before he could reach the door. Stumbling, clawing, he beat off the cold, cold hands grasping for his soul and placed his hand on the doorknob. He twisted it and pulled at the door desperately.

He ran into the dead man he had seen leave a few minutes before. The frozen hands held Arthur's embalming kit.

Cold, cold hands. The mortician fell to the ground in a faint. The ghostly figures moved forward. One got out the instruments from Arthur's black kit. They could, as Arthur had, expect to remain undisturbed for the rest of the evening.

Dark Star

The night flew in swiftly and blanketed the pine woods in darkness. The lone boy sat alone by the dying fire, thinking about the other people who had gotten lost in the pine woods. He remembered how most of them came out alive, but a few were never heard from again. Adjusting his 5'6" frame uncomfortably on the rock he was sitting on, he thought about those people who never were seen again. It filled his rational mind with panic. But he told himself to calm down. He took out his wallet and opened it to the picture of his girlfriend. He thought about their lives together, their dates, AND HOW SHE WALKED, TALKED AND ACTED. She was 16 and he was 15 when they first met, and for three years they have been going... What was that weird noise? the wind? He got up and started to walk down the trail towards the west side of the pine woods. When he reached his destination, he looked out over the power line barriers, so because the county powerlines ran through them. His eyes caught a group of moving shadows just away from the power lines. He quietly started over to investigate. When he was less than 500 feet from the shadows, he didn't know if he was dreaming or not, but he thought he saw people dancing in the darkness. He ventured closer, but stopped when his eyes met the leader's. Her sleek, mysterious body became rigid with anger, and her eyes burned with the animus fire and madness. She raised her left arm up towards the sky, and suddenly the night exploded in a blinking and violent flashing light. He tried to run but he knew he wouldn't make it.

At the Ponderosa Township town hall Sheriff Monroe sat in his office. He checked his clock; it was 5:30 A.M. He slid back in his chair, adjusted his glasses, and yawned in boredom. The western sky suddenly brightened up in brilliant flashes of light.

"What! The northern lights at this hour? Oh, what the hell, I'd better enjoy it, it's probably the only action I'll see tonight", he said sleepily with great boredom.

Suddenly the street lights flickered and went out. He jumped awake and looked at his now inactive clock, 5:35. He looked out his window and watched the spectacular display of lights on the horizon.

"The power lines must have exploded", he thought, "I'm going out there to investigate."

He ran outside, and jumped into his Chief Cherokee and drove onto the Pinewood County fire road. Driving down the washed out unpaved road at top speed was difficult in the gray light of dawn. When he reached the powerlines, the holocaust had ended. He got out of the blue Cherokee and surveyed the damage. An unusual form took shape in the dull light. He moved towards it, and, upon realizing it was a body, backed off towards his truck to get the coroner on the scene. Before he did, he looked up at the high tension pole.

"That looks like it was hit with a cannon" he said.

"It wasn't hit by a cannon, but it was destroyed by a force of equal power," a voice said behind him.

"What are you talking about?"

"Sangayhita, soul force."

"What is your name?"

"Sarah"

"It doesn't matter."

"Tell me, what is this soul force, Sangayhita, or whatever you call it?"

"It is very old, many thousands of years old."

"But what is it?"

"It is the dark star of nature, it is a powerful force."

The coroner drove his van down the fire road and parked next to the Cherokee.

"I have to leave now, Sarah...

"I recommend you talk to Rev. Kirkorian at St. Elizabeth Seteu's Church."

"Thank you, Sarah, see you around."

He turned and walked towards the coroner's van and opened the back door to remove the stretcher.

Later, Sheriff Monroe and Deputy Aaronsen, the sheriff's assistant, pulled up in front of St. Elizabeth Seteu's Church. Telling Deputy Aaronsen that he would meet him at the police booth across the street, Monroe climbed out of the Cherokee and ran up the steps at the church. He opened the large door and walked towards the vestry.

"Reverend Kirkorian" Monroe called.

"Yes, my son" came the answer.

"Do you know any legends involving a Dark Star?"

"Yes, I do, Step into the rectory and I'll tell you about it," the Reverend said.

As they walked into the rectory, the reverend started to explain.

"About 150 years ago, a group of settlers came up here and started a farm. One of the girls of this settlement practiced witchcraft. When she was found out, she was killed by some of the neighbors. Two nights later, she came back to life and killed her killers. Then her spirit possessed one of her sisters who, in turn built up a following among the local indians. According to this legend, she is still alive today."

"Why is she called the Dark Star?"

"She wears a black Pentagram necklace all of the time."

All of a sudden, a rock came flying through a window. It had a note attached to it. Sheriff Monroe picked it up and read it.

"Marker 66 on U.S. 116 tonight at 6:00 P.M.

"I wonder what this means, Reverend?"

"I don't know" said the Reverend.

"Don't worry, I'll find out."

"Please tell me when you do."

"I will."

Monroe ran out of the church and across the street to the police station. He glanced down the road to see where Aaronsen had gone, then he heard a voice behind him.

"Hello Sheriff."

"Sarah! am I glad to see you! Could you please tell me what this note means?"

She looked it over.

"According to this note, you are supposed to meet someone at marker 66 on U.S. Highway 116 at 6:00 P.M. tonight."

"Do you think I should go Sarah?"

"I sense great danger, but you must go."

He hurried back across the street towards the church.

At 5:45, Sheriff Monroe and Reverend Kirkorian were driving down U.S. 116 towards mile marker 66.

"Can't you go any faster?" the reverend yelled above the sound of the engine.

"I'm going 75 already Father" Monroe retorted.

"Slow down Sheriff, we just passed marker 65."

As he slowed the Cherokee down, Monroe began to find their car harder to control. Suddenly, it started to swerve uncontrollably all over the road. Then it flipped over on the road. Monroe and Rev. Kirkorian crawled out, the sheriff looked around dazed.

"Father, what time is it?" he said groggily.

"I don't know. I lost my watch."

Monroe crawled over to the Cherokee, turned on the radio, and called in for a time check.

"6:00 P.M., Sheriff" came the reply.

"Please send a tow truck to mile marker .... Standby. Father! could you please find a mile marker for me?"

Reverend Kirkorian walked over to the other side of the Cherokee to see if he could find one.

"Sheriff, come over here for a minute." the Reverend yelled suddenly.

"This must be someone's idea of a joke," the sheriff said when he saw what the Reverend pointed out to him. Just then, a message came over the sheriff's police radio.

"KJL-721 to Sheriff Monroe."

He ran over to the Cherokee and picked up the microphone.

"Sheriff Monroe here."

"Where do you want that tow truck, Sheriff?"

He paused for a minute and looked at Reverend Kirkorian.

"Mile Marker 66."

"That accident could have been worse, Sheriff. I should have told you not to go."

Sarah was sitting in the sheriff's office later that night, talking to Sheriff Monroe as he was getting ready to go home for the night.

"It's okay Sarah. I was hounding the town for 6 months about a new truck. It had over 150,000 miles on it. What bugs me though is how did all four tires blow out at the same time?"

"Most likely it was her."

"Dark Star?"

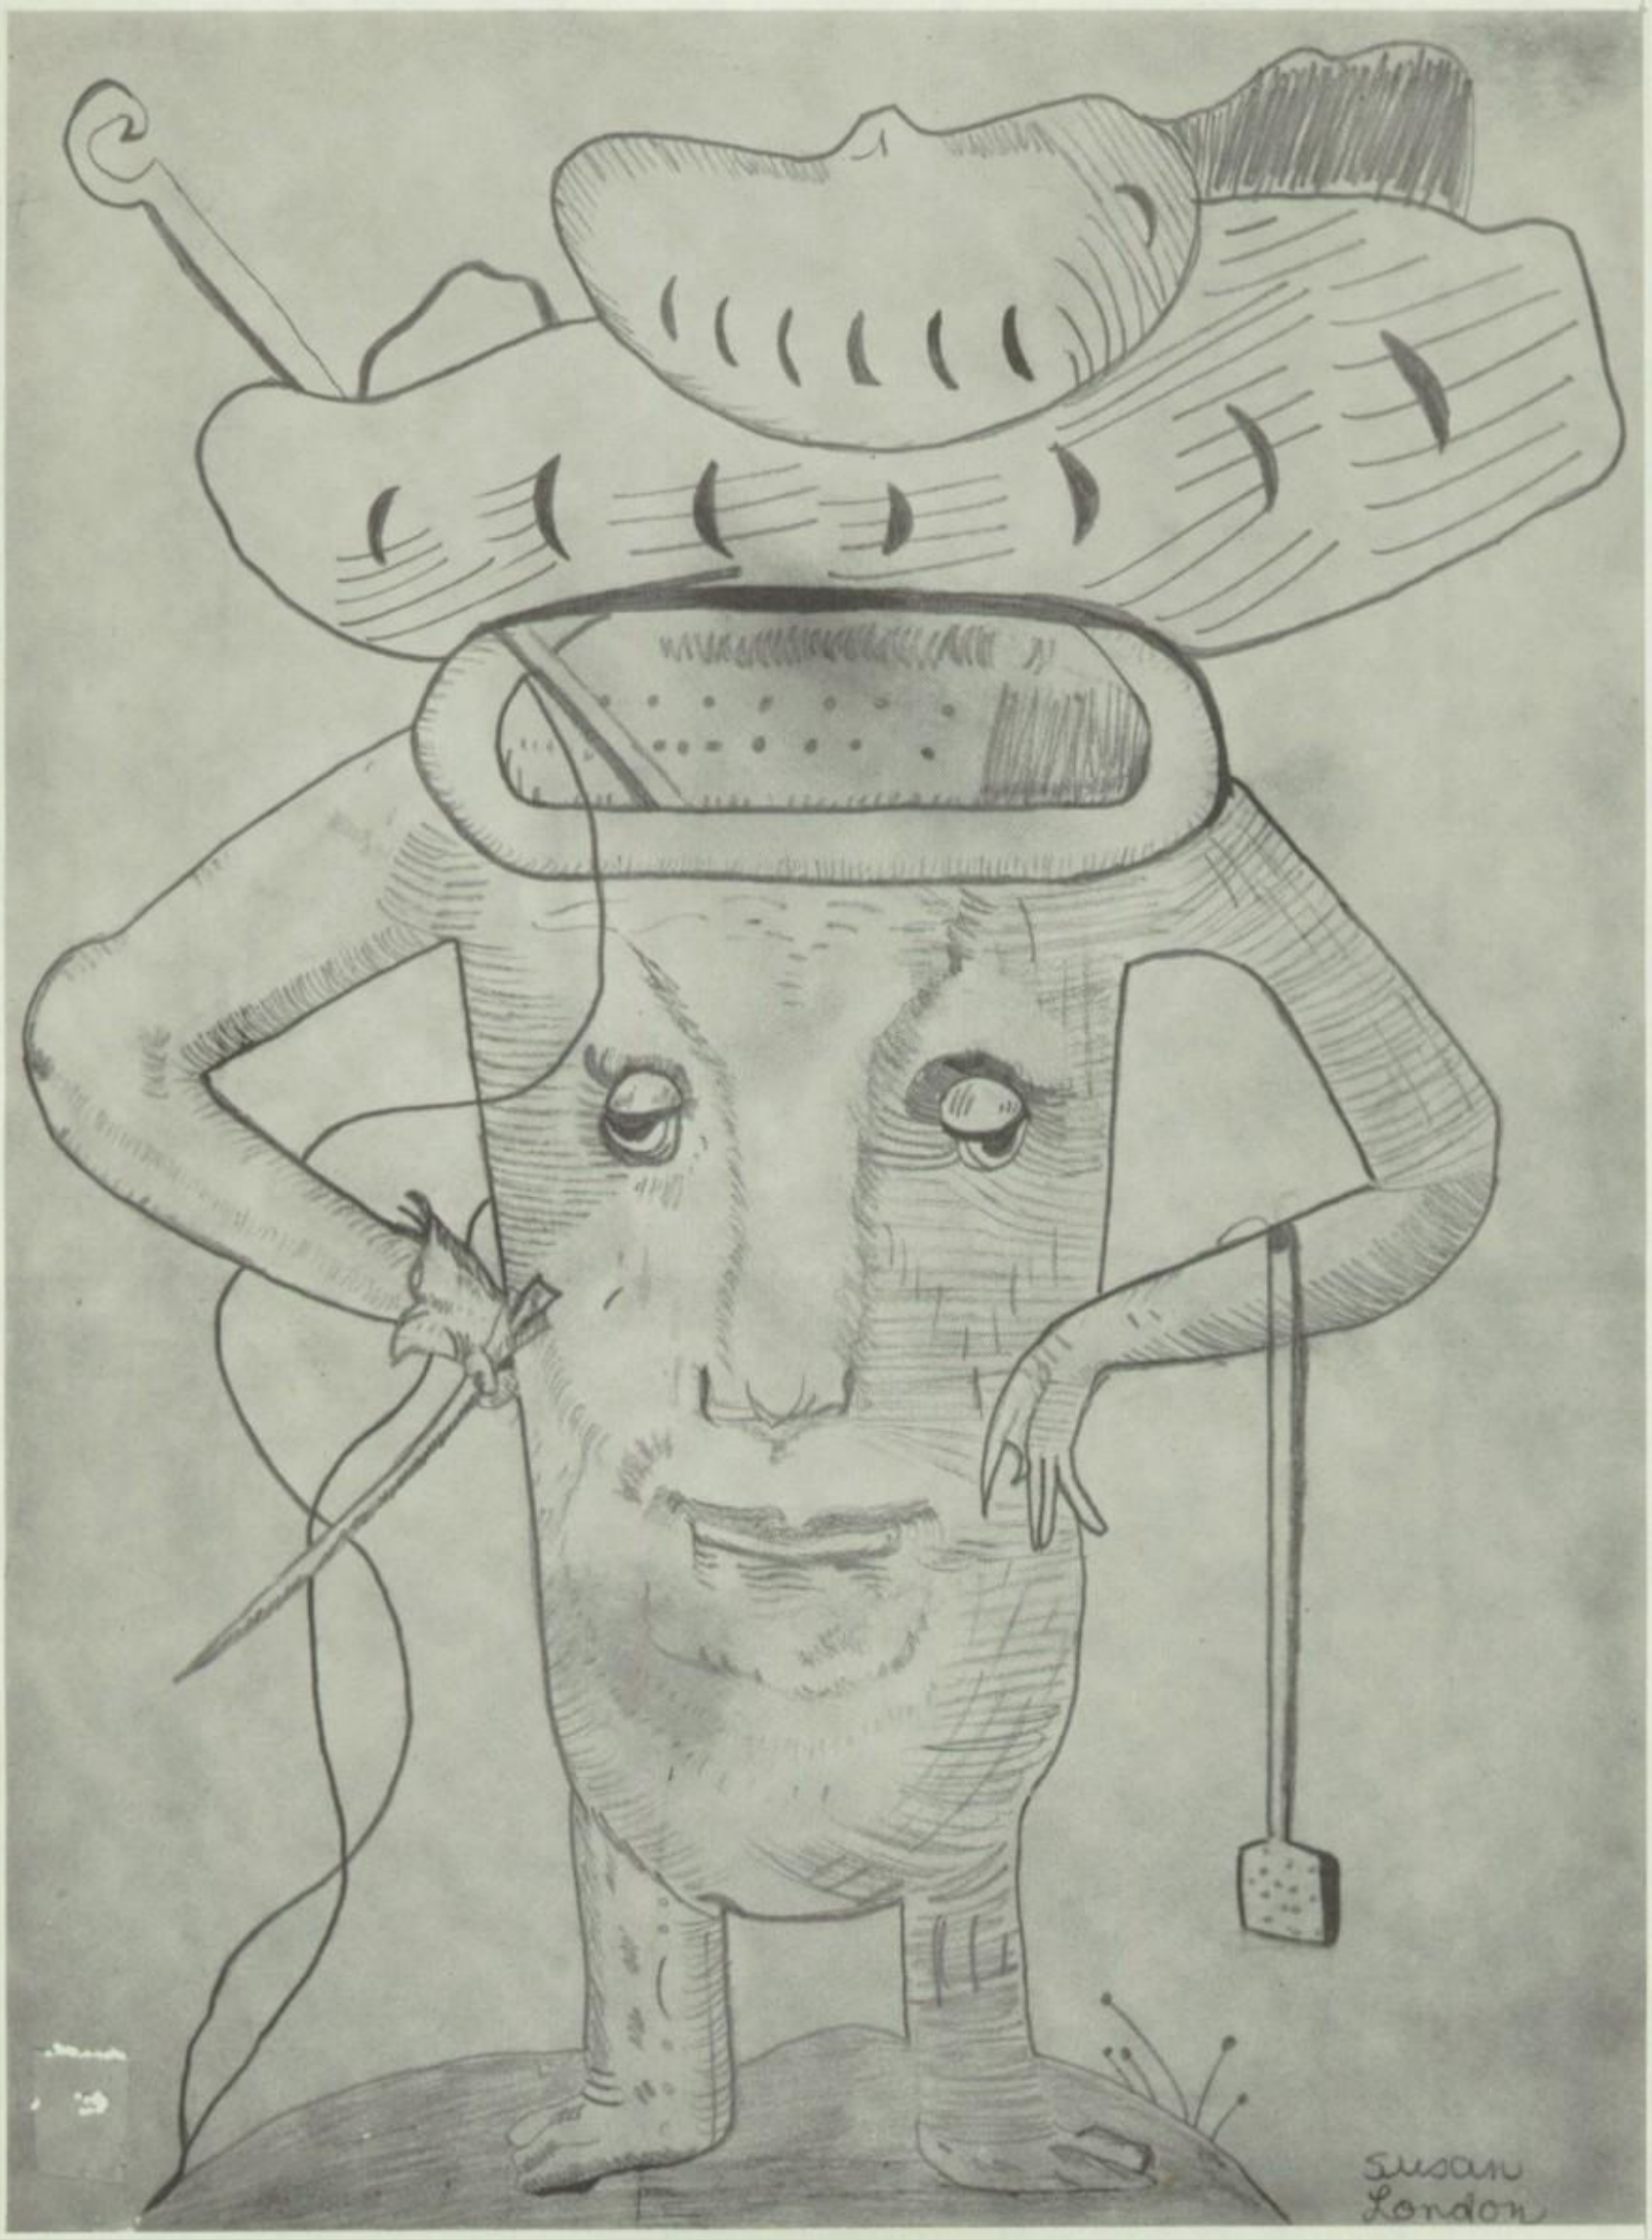
She nodded.

"What the hell is she trying to prove?"

"She is showing off her power so she can scare everyone into submission."

"In other words, she's trying to take over the world, right?"

Again she nodded.



Susan
London

They were all silent for a long time as Monroe pondered a way to thwart Dark Star's plan. An idea materialized in his head at that moment. He turned to Sarah.

"Is there any way to stop her?"

Sarah shook her head.

"Come on Sarah, there's got to be some way to stop her from terrorizing the community."

"There isn't."

"What about Reverend Kirkorian. Can he do something?"

Sarah sat silently, reflecting on what Monroe just said. She stood up and walked across the room. Then she spoke.

"Yes, maybe. For he is a man of God. He could banish her in God's name."

"Good!"

He lunged for the phone and dialed St. Elizabeth Seteu's rectory. The phone rang 15 times before a sleepy voice answered.

"Hello?"

"Father, this is Sheriff Monroe, get dressed and wait for me, I'm coming over..."

"Do you know what time it is?"

"Father, I can ex..."

"It's 2:30 in the morning!"

"It's about Dark Star."

The name jerked Reverend Kirkorian awake immediately.

"Come right over, Sheriff."

"Thank you, Father."

But before he could finish his sentence, Reverend Kirkorian had hung up.

The 4 wheel drive pickup careened recklessly down the old fire road. Sheriff Monroe sat tensely behind the wheel staring blankly at the road, occasionally jerking his arm to make a sharp turn to avoid an obstacle. His right foot had the gas pedal mashed down to the floor, and his left foot positioned over the brake pedal. Reverend Kirkorian was hanging on to the passenger door for dear life with both hands. Being held stationary on the floor of the truck by Reverend Kirkorian's feet, was a black suitcase, which was filled with things Reverend Kirkorian needed to vanquish Dark Star.

Monroe suddenly mashed his foot down on the brake and made the truck come to a stop in the clearing. Monroe and Reverend Kirkorian quietly slipped out of the truck. They proceeded across the field silently until they observed shadows dancing in the dull moonlight. Reverend Kirkorian then turned to Sheriff Monroe and said, "you had better stay here Sheriff."

"I agree, the sheriff said.

Reverend Kirkorian walked toward the dancing shadows. When he got within 100 feet of them he put down the black suitcase. He opened it, removed a Bible, and opened it to the 23rd Psalm. Then, he started reading it aloud. She turned and looked at him, closed her eyes, and chanted something that the Reverend could not understand. Suddenly, the Bible disintegrated in his hands. But Reverend Kirkorian was not phased. He went back to his suitcase and produced a crucifix. He then turned and raised the crucifix over his head. She turned away and intoned another spell. A mysterious lightning bolt knocked the crucifix out of his hand. Still undaunted, he went to his suitcase again, and this time, he produced a half gallon of Holy Water. She looked at him in curiosity, wondering what he was going to do with it. He walked towards her, lifted the bottle over his head, and threw it at her. It hit her right in the stomach, it exploded. The night was filled with light and the area was filled with electricity. The blast threw Reverend Kirkorian over by the truck. Sheriff Monroe crawled over from where he lay in the field over to Reverend Kirkorian. He opened the door of the truck, helped the unconscious Reverend into the truck, turned the truck around and mashed his foot on the gas pedal as the high voltage holocaust raged on behind them.

Monroe was awakened by a fireman tapping on the window of his truck.

"What the hell happened!"

"Didn't you see? The power lines blew up last night, took three hours to bring it under control. Five counties are blacked out."

He turned his head to see if Reverend Kirkorian was all right, but he wasn't there.

"Where's Reverend Kirkorian?"

"He's down by the explosion site. You should have seen it last night Sheriff, it was really..."

A voice called out to Monroe.

"Sheriff, they need you by the explosion site."

At the explosion site, Sheriff Monroe jumped out of the telephone truck and ran over to the main group of people.

"Where's Reverend Kirkorian?"

A man pointed over by a fire truck, "Over there."

"Thanks."

He ran over towards the truck and spied Reverend Kirkorian standing with another man.

"Reverend!"

Kirkorian motioned him over. The man who stood with him started to talk.

"The transformer was hit by a tremendous burst of energy, which in turn, contributed to the destruction of the powerlines and the destruction you see here."

"What caused this?" he said pointing to a large crater in the ground.

"I don't know, Sheriff."

Monroe took the Reverend aside.

"Was that caused by Dark Star?"

"Yes," answered the Reverend.

"Does that mean she's...dead?"

"I'm afraid we'll never know."
